

Authors

Esther Duflo
Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Why Political Reservations?

Esther Duflo^{*}

Department of Economics and Poverty Action Lab, MIT

September 2004

Abstract

Many countries are amending their political systems to set aside positions to groups, such as women and racial or religious minorities, that are perceived as being disadvantaged. Using evidence from India, this article assesses the case for these reservations.

JEL: H1, O15

^{*}Acknowledgments: I thank Raghuram Rajan and Pooja Topol for their collaboration on these projects, as well as Greg Fischer for outstanding research assistance and great comments. I thank Abhijit Banerjee, Rohini Pande, and seminar participants at the IZA meetings in Munich for comments. I gratefully acknowledge financial support from the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation, the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation, and the National Institutes of Health (through Grant no. R01HD08022-01).
^{*}Email: eduflo@mit.edu

Why Political Reservations?

Many countries are amending their political systems to set aside positions to groups, such as women and racial or religious minorities, that are perceived as being disadvantaged. Using evidence from India, this article assesses the case for these reservations.

September 01, 2004