IPA Hosts Workshop on Promising Approaches to Address Child Stunting

On December 11th, IPA hosted a workshop to discuss promising approaches and interventions to address child stunting. This event took place as part of IPA's Consolidation Research Initiative, which aims to move evidence-based approaches to reduce child stunting from proof-of-concept to scalable programs and policies. For the workshop, IPA convened a small group of experts from a range of backgrounds, including academics and practitioners, to identify and discuss promising evidence-based approaches to prioritize for future research through the initiative. The workshop focused on approaches that already have evidence for their effectiveness and explore ways that they can be adapted to new contexts and implemented at larger scales.
