Webinar | The Psychosocial Value of Work: Evidence from Refugee Camps in Bangladesh

On May 24, IPA's Chief Research and Policy Officer Radha Rajkotia moderated the fourth webinar in the series, Building the Evidence on Forced Displacement: From Research to Policy Making, to discuss findings from the latest research on forced displacement. This webinar focused on a study on the impact of access to work for Rohingya refugees living in Bangladesh.

Engaging in productive activities may yield benefits that go beyond earning a wage or income, such as improved psychosocial wellbeing. This study empirically tests this hypothesis among Rohingya refugees living in Bangladesh. 745 individuals participated in the randomized study and were assigned to one among three groups: a 'work-task' group which was compensated for engaging in a small task, a 'cash' group that received a cash equivalent without needing to work, and a 'comparison' group that did not receive either. Findings show that individuals who were engaged in this activity had substantially better psychosocial wellbeing than individuals who only received cash.
